

WHAT I DO, IN ONE PAGE

I find the one spot where a small push gets the whole thing moving.

Companies get stuck — decisions drag for months, projects stall, suppliers overcharge, teams blame each other. Michael finds the one spot where a small push gets the whole thing moving, then pushes there with you. Twenty-one years of doing it in big business, most of it in big retail. The first conversation is free and there’s no pitch.

Sound familiar?

SIX THAT LAND ON DESKS LIKE YOURS

THE SITUATION ON YOUR DESK	WHAT IT USUALLY IS	WHAT MOVING LOOKS LIKE
The capex approval on its third resubmission	Nobody owns the no	Signed this quarter
The supplier decision stuck in review while the old contract quietly renews itself	The risk has no owner	The new contract signed
The org redesign everyone agrees with and nobody signs	Two functions, one gap	One owner, one date
The system go-live postponed a third quarter	“Ready” was never defined	A date that holds
The price increase you know you must pass on, and haven’t	The talk nobody will start	The letter goes out
The renegotiation you’re losing slowly, one small concession at a time	Silence is a decision	You set the terms

What moving looks like — patterns, not client names.

HOW THE PUSH GETS FOUND – FOUR LENSES

- ◆ Find the one point where a small move unsticks the whole system.
 - ◆ Use AI to see what the spreadsheets can’t.
- ◆ Navigate the mess instead of pretending it’s simple.
 - ◆ Design the change so it holds after I leave.

Each of these has a method behind it — the fuller case for each is at probabilitycrisis.com.

CALL WHEN

✓ The strategy is sound and the people are capable, but something sticks between the boardroom and the floor — and you can use an uncomfortable truth.

DON’T WHEN

✗ You want a decision already made validated, a deck delivered, or a fully-specified plan run without friction.

How it works: thirty minutes on your one stuck thing. Often the likely jam, named plainly. Then you decide what happens next.
